- 1. The political orientation of the Bulgarian populations is largely influenced by the precarious economic situation. Antipathies toward the present form of government exist in various strata of the population. However, as time goes by and the older generations disappear, the youth no longer hear comparisons made with other times, and readily subject themselves to what is imposed on them and consider this a normal way of life. In fact there are young children who ate chocolate for the first time when they were 10 years old and believed it to be a product created by the Communists.
- Aspirations are directed toward the old institutions, without the monarchy, however. Old and middle-aged people still hold a happy memory of King Boris but have no esteem for the monarchical ministers.
- 3. Feelings against the government are very strong in the country, and as a result, the government has been forced to review and modify certain measures in order to attempt to diminish the ill will it has caused.
- 4. With regard to agricultural cooperatives, here too the government has had to resort to helping the "Kolkhoz" by various methods in order to avoid a serious failure of the entire cooperative system. In fact in 1953, an incentive was given to cattle treeding and there was a decrease in taxes. Veterinary aid was given gratuitously, and artificial insemination centers were established.
- 5. In order to diminish the burden of manual labor, efforts were made toward increasing agricultural mechanization, and in this connection the press gave wide publicity to the start of the construction in southern Bulgaria of an establishment for the production of agricultural equipment and machinery.
- 6. Furthermore, when the farmer or the cooperative have given the specified quotas to the State collecting centers, they may sell in the free market what is left over.
- 7. All these measures are no more than an effort to remedy what has become a difficult situation among farmers. It is too soon to estimate whether these
